

PINPOINT

This machine issued tickets by credit card only. They were provided by Barclaycard and were installed at a few main line stations, initially at London Euston from 30th May 1984. The machines were similar in appearance to early cash dispensers found inside banks and Building Societies. They consisted of a numeric keypad and a monitor display with 5 buttons on each side of the display. After the credit card was inserted and PIN number entered on the keypad, the monitor displayed a list of stations available. The button adjacent to the required station was pressed, the ticket type, class and number of tickets required was selected in the same way. The option was then given to accept or reject the transaction. If accepted, the ticket was issued after the credit card was removed.

The ticket consisted of three sections. The left portion being the receipt, the right portion was the outward or single ticket and the centre portion was the return, this section not being used on singles.

The machines were removed by 31st December 1988.
